You are invited to join a local roundtable!

Topic: Enriching out-of-school time for Idaho youth.

By the time a child reaches the age of 18, they will spend 79% of their waking hours outside of a classroom. Research reveals that youth consistently enrolled in out-of-school (OST) programs perform better academically, have better school attendance, adjust better socially and emotionally, have healthier lifestyles and are more likely to graduate from high school and go-on to higher learning. They are also less likely to abuse drugs, commit crimes or become teen parents. With this in mind, the Idaho AfterSchool Network is hosting a series of regional roundtables this May.

Who: You, school administrators, educators, early-childhood program providers, out-of-school time program providers, public officials, juvenile justice administrators, state agencies, parents and other community members.

What: Gather with communities near you to discuss how we can collectively maximize local resources, create and strengthen partnerships and increase communication to support youth during out-of-school time. Identify local resources that are currently available for youth and discuss challenges and obstacles to offering more services to youth during OST.
